1

MATCH THE CORRECT SYSTEM WITH YOUR SPORTS OR ACTIVITY

The first step to finding the right system is to consider your activities. Will the space host light cardio or heavy weight training? Should it accommodate spikes and ice skates with ease, too? Which sports will use this facility most often? Get answers to these questions before planning out your project!

2

MATCH THE CORRECT WEIGHT RECOMMENDATIONS

If you select a floor that doesn't match the intended training and machine weights, it'll greatly jeopardize the overall durability of the surface and your value. Select a system that meets the necessary weight requirements.

3

SELECT THE LEVEL OF SOUND REDUCTION YOU NEED

Reducing noise is an important aspect of designing your facility. Depending on the location and use, you'll need to consider the required noise reduction. Not all systems are created equal. Be sure to take the time to consider all the factors.

4

SELECT YOUR MATERIAL AND FORMAT

Rubber flooring comes in a variety of tile or roll formats and materials, like vulcanized and composite rubber. It's important to research the type of system and installation method that's ideal for your space.

We went with the Droptile because the environment we're in, the abuse it takes with weights being dropped on the floor either accidentally or through some of the Olympic lifts, we wanted something that was going to hold up over time and look as good ten years from now as it did the day we installed it
